STUDY FINDS PREDICTORS OF HOSPITAL READMISSION

A study released by the University of Alberta found that residents discharged from hospitals risked readmission based on the setting they were discharged to. 88,000, of the study population was readmitted to the hospital within 30 days. If residents were discharged to home based services they were most likely to be readmitted. They also experienced the longest stays.

Meanwhile, individuals who started off in the community and were later discharged into long-term care had the lowest likelihood of hospital admission. Individuals admitted from and subsequently discharged to long-term care had an increased likelihood of readmission. It was suggested that long-term care residents are often prematurely discharged from hospital because providers there have little experience in long-term care and make erroneous assumptions about available resources.
